But the centuries-old answer to this question - the to-do list - can be a challenge in another. Crumpled pieces of paper and semi-written lists are lost or trashed, and this does not do much for productivity or task management. Fortunately, there are many greats to bring your to-do list to the digital age Has. These apps offer high productivity features like mobile update, push notifications, and calendar integration Aren't you sure which app makes the most sense for you? No problem. Check out a summary of six to-do lists divided by work style to find your perfect match. 1. Goal Setter: Astrid is a great way to get the train to Astrid, as if you are a to-do list novice or just keep it simple. The free web app comes with preset lists that are easy to click and fill. Developing a task system is also easy. Just click the desired list and add the items. Users can change each list to prioritize and repeat tasks. For social to-do task managers, Astrid also provides a system for users to invite friends and assign jobs. In contrast, Astrid sends weekly completion updates, and even the service washes out a nice complement after completing your checklist. The free version of Astrid offers mobile and desktop apps synced over the cloud. For a month of just $5, users can raise the premium, which is worth 1 GB in audio backup features, completion graphics, and attachments. Whether it's free or paid, Astrid is a good entry point in the world of digital to-dos. 2. Minimalist: Todoist is a low-key tool for you, then Todoist is focused on getting things done without all the bells and nesses than your business style. On the surface, Todoist doesn't look like much. Her minimal white platform may look a little nude, if not debilitating. But Todoist is really easy to fill, and offers some great features. For example, Todoist has enough power to get an almost endless list of tasks, meaning there is no data ceiling to hit. After a project is developed, it can be divided into sub-projects, which can be divided into sub-tasks. Each task can have a deadline, and projects can be color-coded for even more organizations. A ton of work to be done? Todoist also has an intelligent overview mode that inserts urgent tasks in all projects and shows how to shake up a week. Although minimalist, Todoist has plenty of integration with other platforms. The free version of the program adds access from mobile devices as well as Chrome, Firefox, Gmail, Outlook and Thunderbird add-ons. But if you want calendar integration, get ready to pony up to $29 a year. 3. Multitasker: Remember that one of the challenges of the Milk To Do list is actually stopping what you are doing and adding a task to the list when it arrives. Switching to the Browser tab or a separate app can discourage instant additions. If you're that kind of person, it's time to forget about milk and adopt it. Keep in mind that Milk's free program works like a standard to-do app. Thanks to the service, users can set tasks, organize them into lists, and receive reminders when something happens. But where Remember the Milk really separates itself is many ways to connect to it. and add-ons, you can add tasks to Remember Milk through iPhone, Android and iPad apps and underd place. In fact, you can even send a task to remember Milk via Twitter or Siri. You can also get reminders for your tasks through almost any service, including RSS, text, and Skype. If you're keen to keep a to-do list but need to have multiple access points, remember why milk is a simple and easy way to keep everything organized. 4. Collaborationist: How easy is the Personal to-do list in Toodledo, but what can be easy to keep about to manage a project list for a group of people or a family? A seamless platform for group tasks can be difficult, but not with Toodledo. Toodledo creates a workspace to organize projects and tasks instead of just a simple list. Users can categorize tasks by severity level, create a customized hot list to organize tasks that already exist and track immediate concerns. But collaboration is where Toodledo stands out, allowing users to invite others to the workspace instead of sharing tasks or projects. The result is a common area where a group can list all to-dos instead of assigning them between different fields. 5. Cloud Champion: Wunderlist Love cloud? Then you will love Wunderlist, the free to-do list service available on Mac, Windows, Linux and all smartphones. Users can develop their own list through Wunderlist's web app or desktop app. Then, by clicking the sync button, Wunderlist automatically updates all lists on all devices, which the app is in. Therefore, all tasks updated through your phone are sent to your tablet and computer without difficulty. Users also share lists over the cloud, allowing your friends to access tasks with an easy and secure URL. If you're constantly switching between different devices or spending a lot of time on the road, Wunderlist helps you keep all your tasks organized wherever you are. 6. Kitchen Sink: Workflowy Maybe a simple to-do list doesn't just do it for you. If you're a person who fills laptops and notebooks with ideas, projects, goals, and brainstormers, you should take over Workflowy. Think of it as a long, continuous outline. Users simply drop out of different sections and then fill them with tasks, subtasks, and so on. Unlike other outline services, Workflowy allows users to narrow down each list and focus on the task at hand. Each completed task can also be transferred to the permanent archive of action items, and nothing is lost. Chapter task list, part brainstorming playground, Workflowy is ideal for those who want to write absolutely everything. What's your favorite to-do list? Let us know for comment.
